But the ideal job search doesn't go through all the ordinary channels — submitting a resume, waiting, interviewing, waiting, and then getting a job. No, the shortest and most effective job search is one where you ask for a job and then get it: No (or at least "few") questions asked. When you're posed the interview question, "What did you not like about your last job?" don't fall for the trap of moaning about the terrible things you had to do and your inept last boss. Instead, give a positive answer that shows how you are willing to take on difficult tasks and be innovative in how you handle them. You can tell an interview is about to end when the interviewer asks you if you have any other questions, at which time you need to give your best shot. Stories are your best bet here. Reserve a question that you can use to lead into your story until the hiring manager asks if you have a last question. Here's a fun fact: Every single time I've opened up a position at any company I've worked at, at least one person's submitted a resume that won't open. Here's a fun guess: The person who submitted that resume (or cover letter or writing sample) intended for it to be opened—and read.
